

Louis Vuitton Brand Audit - LV v/s Gucci v/s Dior

The Brief

I chose Louis Vuitton because I have always been fascinated by how luxury brands market desire, not products. I follow LV, Gucci and Dior closely, and kept noticing gaps between what these brands show the world and what Indian customers actually experience. That gap became the question I wanted to answer.

Over 30 days, I audited LV across 6 platforms - Instagram, Website, LinkedIn, YouTube, Paid Ads, and Google Maps reviews from DLF Emporio Delhi and compared every finding against Gucci and Dior. No client relationship. No brief from anyone. Just genuine curiosity about whether the marketing matches the market.

My biggest finding: LV has built the strongest digital infrastructure for India of any luxury brand - a dedicated India website, INR pricing, a WhatsApp purchase button, but is feeding that infrastructure with content that wasn't made for this audience, and losing customers at the last mile because of it.

That gap is the opportunity. There are my 3 recommendations to close it.

Executive Summary

Luxury brands are often admired for their products, but what truly sets them apart is how they connect with customers across every touchpoint—from social media and advertising to websites and in-store experiences.

This project explores the digital marketing strategies of Louis Vuitton, with Gucci and Dior used as benchmark competitors. The objective was to understand how these brands build awareness, engage audiences, and maintain their premium positioning in an increasingly digital world.

Using publicly available data and marketing tools, I analyzed the brands across multiple channels, including Instagram, LinkedIn, YouTube, paid advertisements, website performance, and customer reviews. The research revealed clear differences in how each brand approaches content, customer engagement, and digital growth.

Some key questions explored in this analysis include:

- Which brand generates the strongest digital presence?
- How do their social media strategies differ?
- What role does paid advertising play in their marketing mix?
- How does customer experience influence brand perception?
- What opportunities exist for Louis Vuitton to strengthen its position further?

The findings suggest that while Louis Vuitton leads in overall digital infrastructure and website performance, Gucci stands out for audience engagement and Dior excels in storytelling and emotional brand communication. At the same time, customer reviews highlight areas where all three brands can improve the luxury experience beyond their products.

This portfolio combines data-driven insights with strategic recommendations to evaluate how luxury brands compete in the digital landscape and what marketers can learn from their success.

📸 Instagram - Who’s actually winning attention?

Three brands. Three completely different content philosophies. One uncomfortable truth for LV.

💡 LV posts 23 times a weeks and gets an engagement rate of 0.065%. Gucci posts 20 times a week and gets 1.14%. Dior posts 29 times a week and gets 0.49%. Volume is not the strategy. Resonance is.

🐝 Why the bee matters for Dior - The bee is one of Dior's oldest symbols. Christian Dior called his atelier at 30 Avenue Montaigne a "beehive" and nicknamed his seamstresses "the bees" to honour their craft. Monsieur Dior also considered the bee a lucky charm. When Dior posts a bee on a tulip with zero caption and gets 97K likes, they are not posting a pretty image but they are activating 70 years of brand heritage in a single frame. The tulip itself references the "Tulipe" silhouette from the 1953 Spring-Summer collection. This is what makes Dior's content strategy unique - the less they say, the more history does the talking.

Three posts. Three completely different ideas of what luxury content should do. LV sells access to a celebrity world, Gucci sells an identity, Dior posts 8 words and a bee on a tulip and gets 97k likes. The brand that says the least is saying the most.

🌐 Website - Three Brands, Three Purchase Philosophies

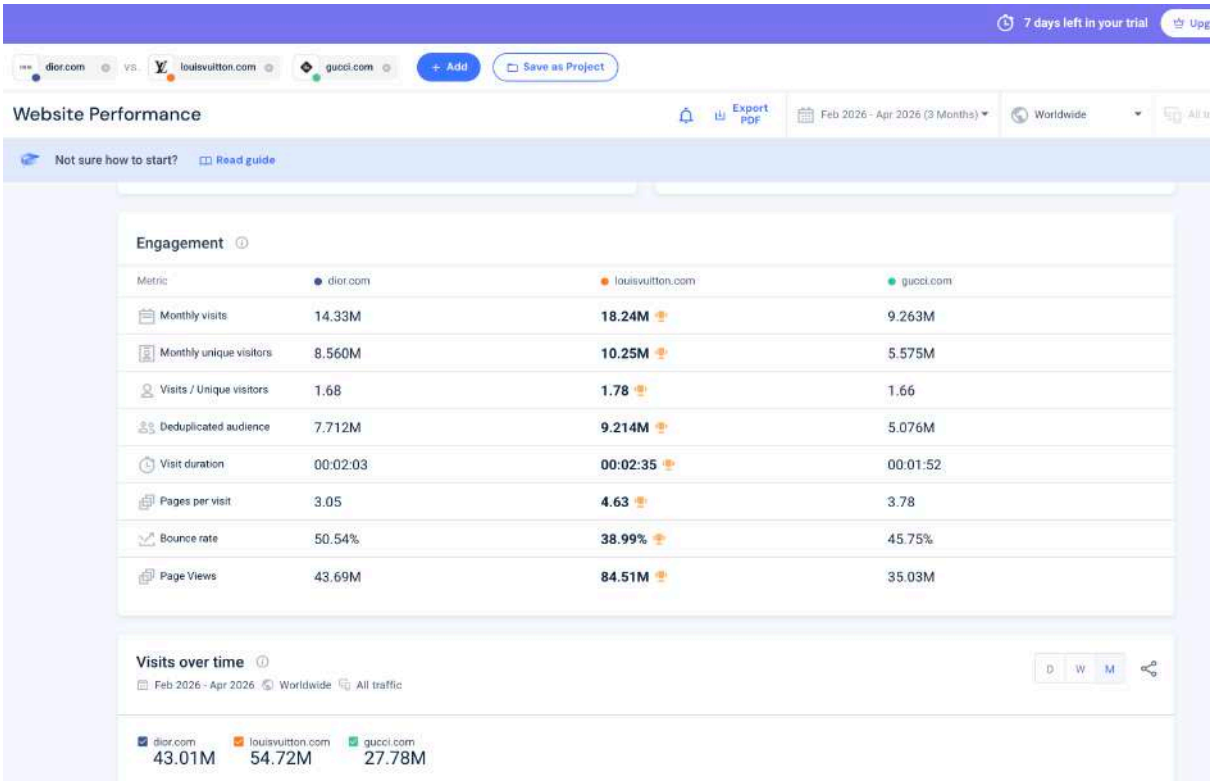

The homepages tells you everything about what a brand thinks of its customer. I opened all three websites on the same day, timed my first impression and what i found was not three versions of luxury - it was three completely different theories about how a sale happens.

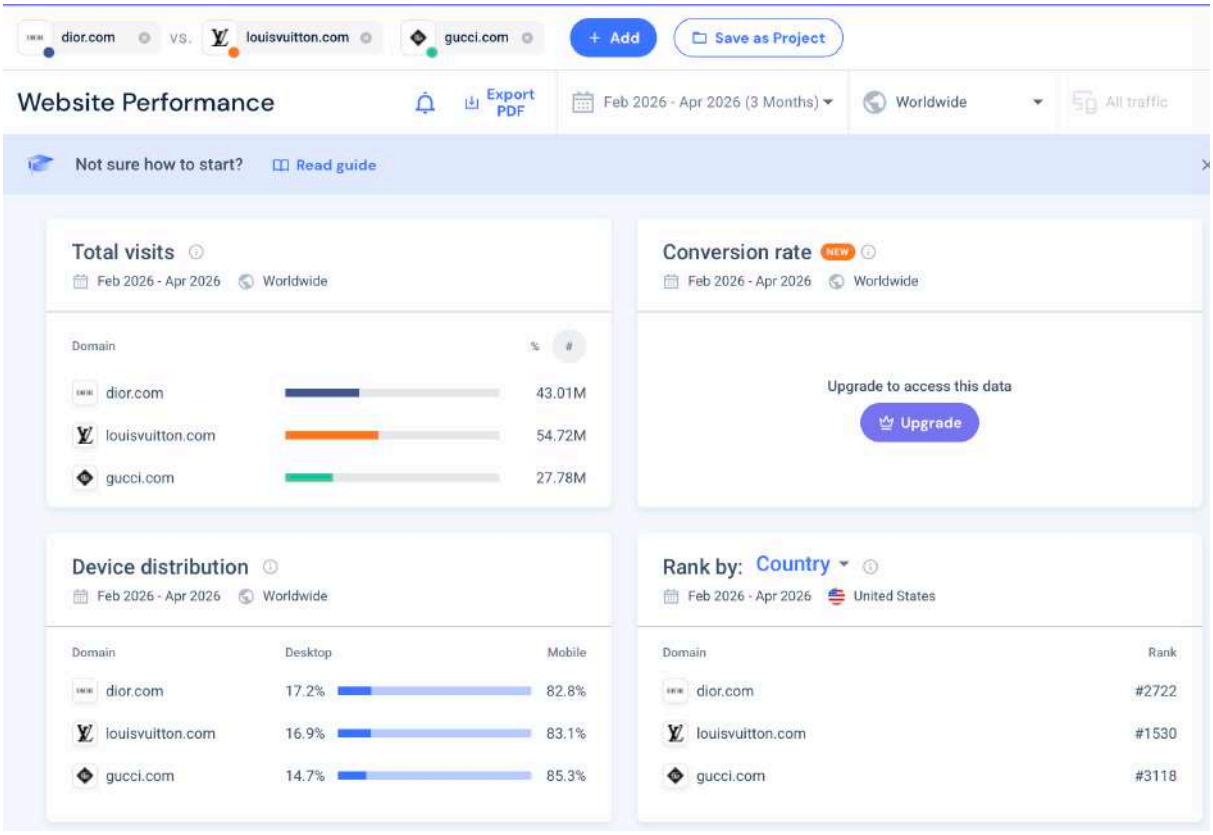

💡 LV says: buy via WhatsApp, Gucci says: contact us, Dior says: visit us or call an advisor. Each CTA reflects the brand perfectly - but only one of them is built for how India actually shops.

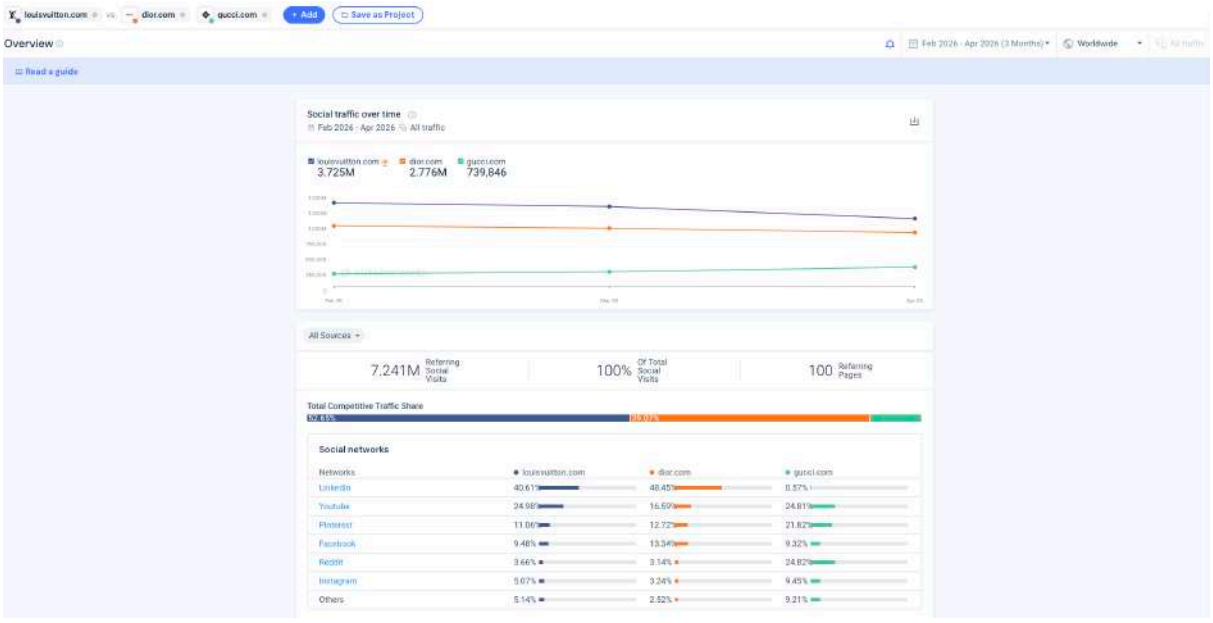

Metric	Louis Vuitton	Gucci	Dior
Homepage Feel	Full screen autoplay video - pure storytelling	Static editorial photo - balanced story and product	Dual split autoplay - fashion and fragrance simultaneously
First CTA	"Discover the Collection"	"DISCOVER MORE"	"Shop Now"

Price visible?	Yes - INR pricing on all pages	Not in INR	Not in INR
Monthly Visits	18.24M - highest	9.26M - lowest	14.33M
Bounce Rate	38.99% lowest - best retention	45.75%	50.54% - highest
India Mobile Experience	9/10 - WhatsApp purchase, INR pricing	6/10 - country selector blocks Indian users	8/10 - clean but no India-specific features

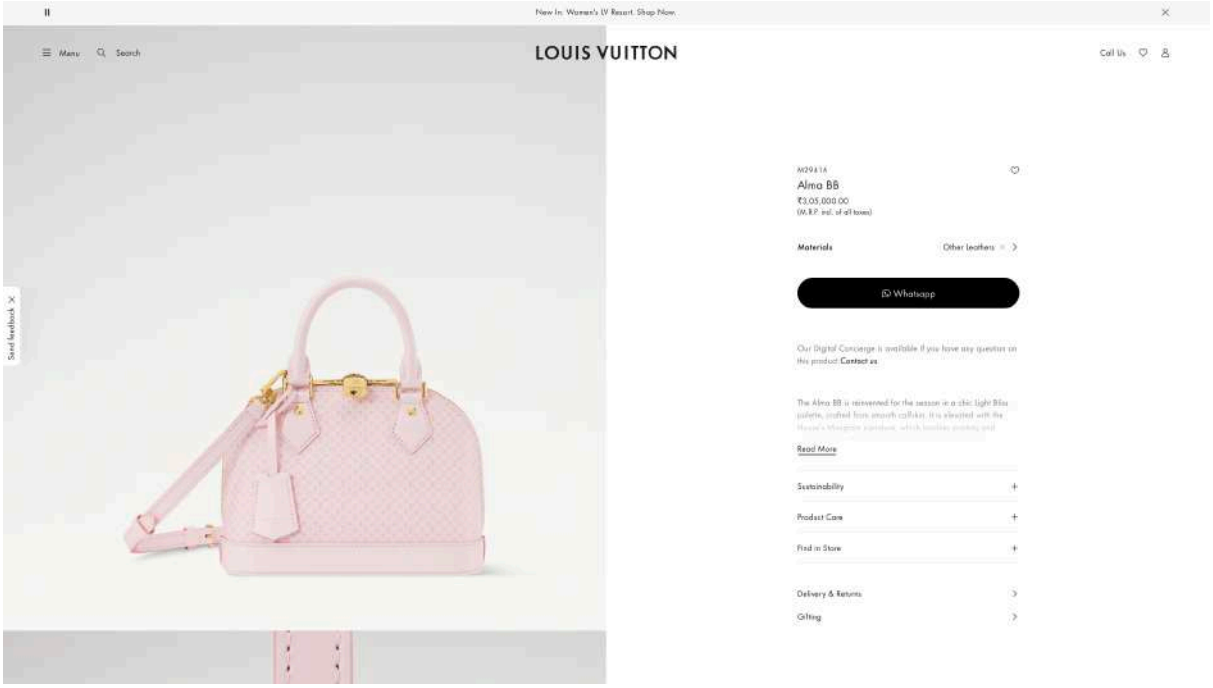

LV Dominates every website metric - most visits, longest time on site, most pages per visit, lowest bounce rate. But the most important finding is not the traffic, It is the WhatsApp purchase button on the India product page - a feature neither Gucci nor Dior has built for India. This is the infrastructure that makes Recommendation 3 possible.

Source: SimilarWeb, Feb 2026 - Apr 2026, Worldwide. LV leads all three brands on every website engagement metric and converts social traffic to website visits at 5x Gucci's rate (3.725M vs 739K). The engine works. The creative is the only missing piece.

🇮🇳 This WhatsApp button exists only on the India version of the LV website. No other luxury brand has built this for India. Gucci's website blocks Indian users with a country selector. Dior has no India-specific page. LV is the only brand that has looked at the Indian customer and said - here is a button that works the way you actually shop.

💼 LinkedIn - The Platform Everyone Ignores in a Brand Audit

Most people skip LinkedIn when auditing a fashion brand. That is a mistake. LinkedIn is where you find out what a brand actually thinks about itself - its people, its culture, its place in the world. What I found across all three brands was completely unexpected.

LV uses LinkedIn like an employer brand platform. 5 out of their last 10 posts were completely LinkedIn-exclusive - artisan stories, employee features, regional content for Asia. You will never see this content on their Instagram. This is the most sophisticated use of LinkedIn of the three brands.

Gucci does not change its voice for LinkedIn at all. Same short bold captions, same campaign content, zero employee stories. But here is the interesting part - the comments on Gucci's LinkedIn are the highest quality of any platform in this entire audit. Marketing directors and brand strategists are writing detailed analysis in the comments. Gucci's audience on LinkedIn is the industry itself.

Dior uses LinkedIn to tell the full story behind what Instagram only hints at. Instagram captions are 1 sentence. LinkedIn captions are 5 to 8 sentences with historical context, artisan details, and cultural references. Every single post ends with #DreamInDior - working simultaneously as employer brand, lifestyle aspiration, and content umbrella. Most cohesive LinkedIn strategy of the three.

🔍 Interesting Find: Dior operates two separate LinkedIn pages - "Christian Dior Couture" for couture and fashion and "Parfums Christian Dior" for fragrance and beauty. This is a deliberate audience separation strategy that neither LV nor Gucci replicates. It means Dior is speaking to fashion professionals and beauty professionals with completely different content and tone. For a brand that appears minimal on Instagram, their LinkedIn architecture is actually the most sophisticated of all three.

Metric	Louis Vuitton	Gucci	Dior
Followers	3.39M	2.37M	1.99M
Unique LinkedIn Content	5 of 10 posts exclusive	Barely 1 out of 10	Richest - museum exhibitions, heritage deep-dives
Best Performing Post	LinkedIn Live - full Cruise 2027 show	GucciCore Manifesto - most unique piece	4,655 likes + 219 reposts - highest of all 3 brands

💡 Dior’s top LinkedIn post got 4,655 likes and 219 reposts - more than any single post from LV or Gucci on LinkedIn. It was a museum exhibition post with 6 sentences of heritage context - Not a campaign, Not a celebrity. Just the brand knowing its own history and writing about it with confidence.

▶️ YouTube - Where Luxury Storytelling Lives or Dies

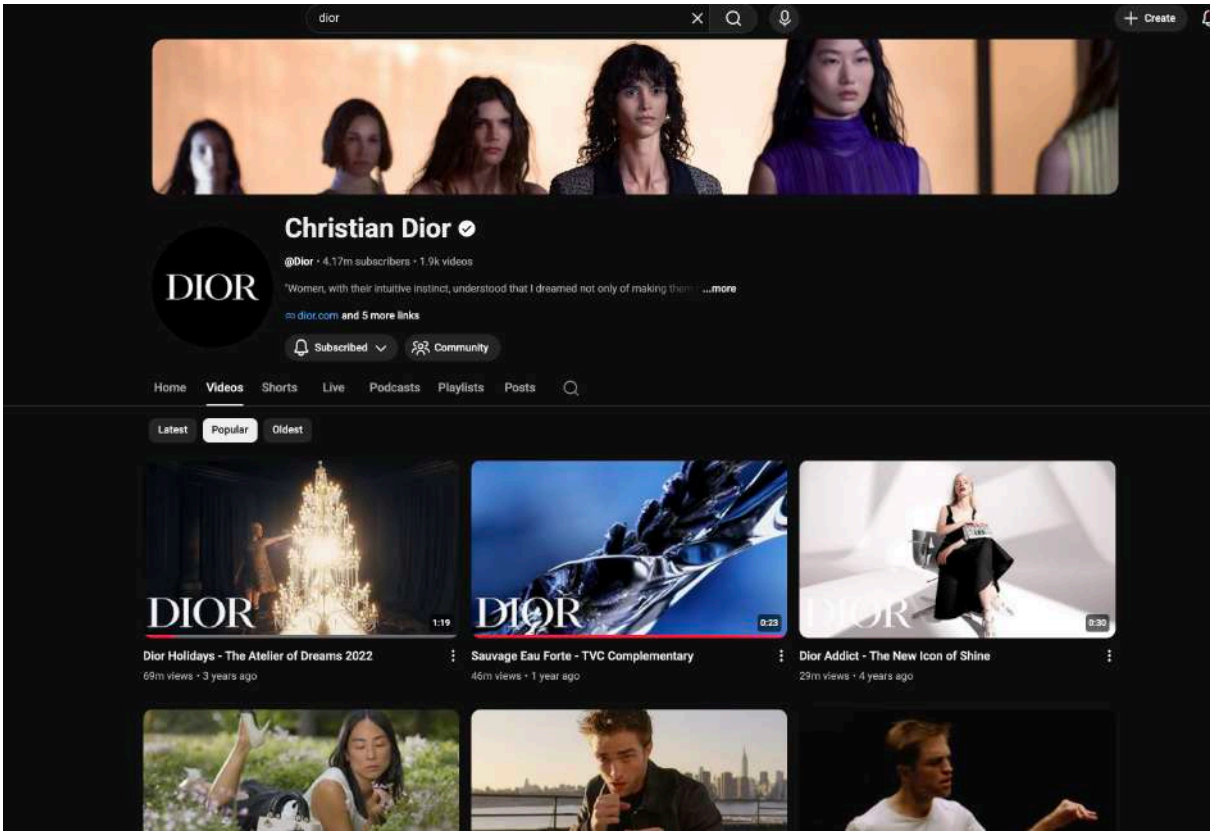

YouTube is where luxury brands prove whether their storytelling is real or just aesthetic. Anyone can make a beautiful Instagram post. A 6-minute film that holds your attention and makes you feel something - that is a different skill entirely. The numbers across these three brands tell a story of one brand that cracked it, one that used to crack it and one that is coasting.

> 📊 Dior: 69M views on their top video. LV: 15M views, and that video is 7 years old. Gucci: 13M views, also years old. The audience for luxury storytelling on YouTube is enormous. Two of these three brands have stopped feeding it.

Metrics	Louis Vuitton	Gucci	Dior
Subscribers	5.44M	1.47M	4.17M
Top Video Views	15M - Emma Stone fragrance.	13M - Gucci Guilty, Jared Leto	69M - Dior Holidays 2022

Age of Top Video	7-8 years old	7-8 years old	3 years old
Craftsmanship Content	Savoir-Faire playlist - 7 videos only	None visible	96 videos in Lady Dior playlist alone
Production Style	Warm cinematic - Sam Mendes direction, Beyoncé music	Bold and provocative - Gustav Mahler symphony, Venice setting	Gothic atmospheric - Shirley Bassey vocals, dark navy and gold

The comment on Dior's Holidays video that stayed with me: "I actually went out of my way to search it up." That is the goal of luxury content - creating something people seek out, not scroll past. LV's Asnières Atelier documentary has 13M views and is years old. The audience wants this content. It just hasn't been made recently. That is the single biggest untapped opportunity in LV's entire marketing strategy.

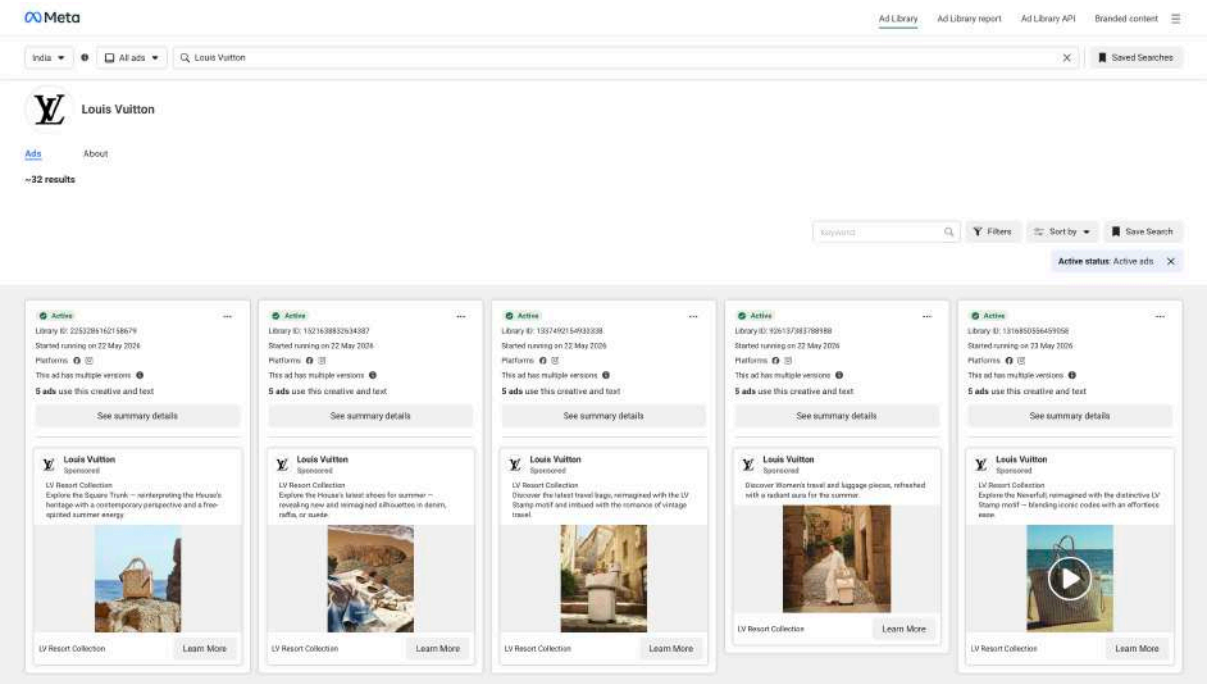

🎬 Dior Holidays 2022 - 69M views. Read the comments. Every single one is someone describing an emotional experience. That is what great brand filmmaking does.

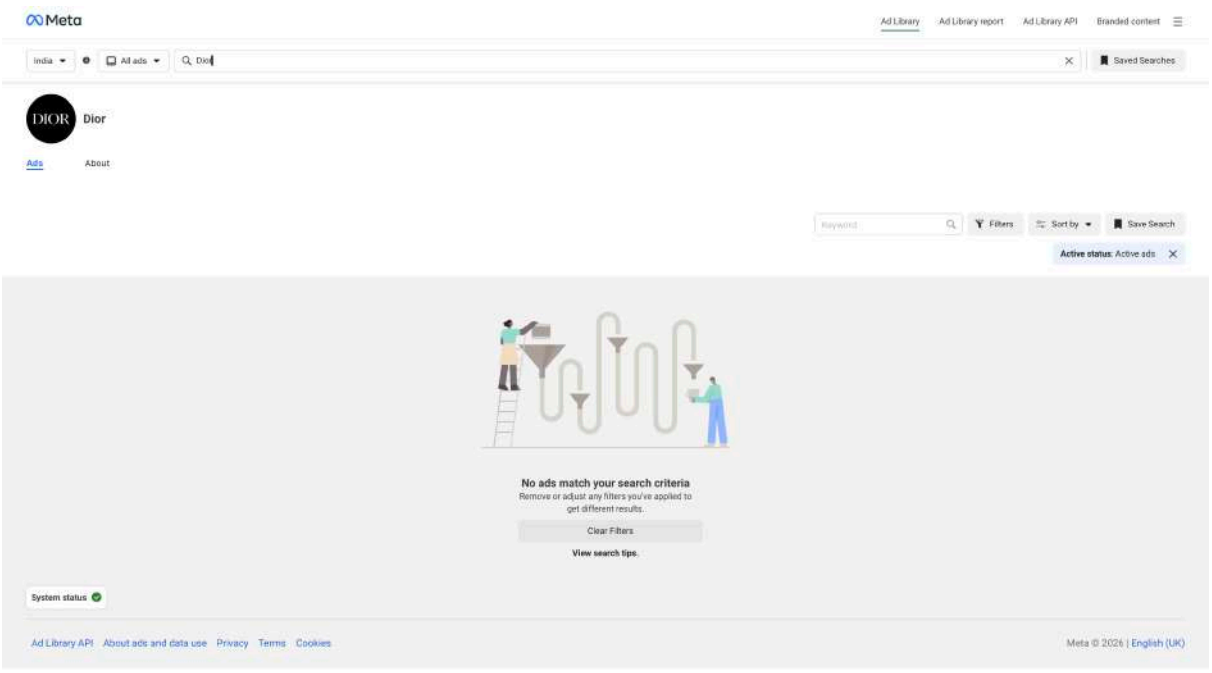

📊 Ads - The Indian Paid Media Gap

I opened the Meta Ads Library and filtered to India for all three brands. What I found in 60 seconds became the foundation of my most important recommendation.

> 🇮🇳 LV: 32 active India ads. Gucci: 10 active India ads. Dior: 0 active India ads - despite running 3,300 ads globally.

Dior is the most aggressive paid media spender of the three brands globally - 3,300 active ads versus LV's 1,500 and Gucci's 750. But in India, they are completely invisible. LV is the only luxury brand with any meaningful India paid presence. But here is the problem: every single one of those 32 ads is a global campaign repurposed for India. There is no Indian face, no Indian setting, no Indian cultural moment anywhere in LV's India paid media.

💡 Both screenshots are from the same tool, same India filter, same date. LV: 32 active ads. Dior: zero. A brand running 3,300 ads globally has made a conscious decision to be invisible in India. That is not a budget problem. That is a strategy problem and it is LV's biggest competitive opportunity.

⭐ In-Store Reality Check - What Indian Customers Actually Say

Every audit should include the voice of the actual customer. I read Google Maps reviews from the DLF Emporio stores for all three brands in New Delhi. The ratings look fine on the surface — LV 4.2, Gucci 4.3. But when you read the actual reviews, a pattern emerges that is consistent across all three brands and directly shapes my recommendations.

🔑 The pattern: All three brands are spending on global marketing that creates desire and then delivering a Delhi store experience that makes Indian customers feel like they do not belong. The marketing brings them to the door, the door turns them away.

🟤 Louis Vuitton - 4.2★ / 831 reviews: The WhatsApp purchase channel - LV's most India-specific tool is going unanswered. One customer confirmed availability on WhatsApp, drove 20km to the store, and was told the product didn't exist. The most liked negative review has 74 likes from a customer who flew to the Paris store to prove a point: "They behave much better than you."

🟢 Gucci - 4.3★ / 591 reviews: The most engaged negative review alleges blatant racism - an Indian customer was held at the door while a white customer was immediately let in with two assistants. The appointment system fails regularly. One customer waited 1.5 hours on a QR waiting list and then bought from LV instead.

⚫ Dior: Staff judging customers by appearance is the single most repeated complaint - spanning 5 years of reviews. A sales associate asked a customer to "read the tag yourself" when asked about scarf composition. The bouncer deciding who enters is described by multiple reviewers as the most humiliating part of the experience.

I've had a very disappointing experience with the Louis Vuitton client service team. I first reached out via WhatsApp to purchase a product that was confirmed as available in store. I was then connected to a client advisor who didn't respond for several days. After following up through the main line, I was told the product had sold out and wouldn't be available for another 12 days.

However, the very next day, the same product showed as available on the website. I reached out again to the same advisor, who confirmed it was now in stock. I asked to place the order immediately before it sold out again, but the advisor went unresponsive — even after multiple follow-ups over several hours, there was still no update.

I then tried connecting through the digital chat on the LV website, where another advisor was initially responsive but soon stopped replying as well.

Overall, the lack of communication, delays, and inconsistent information made this an incredibly frustrating experience. For a brand of Louis Vuitton's reputation, I expected a far higher level of professionalism and efficiency. Still haven't been able to complete my purchase.

Had an excellent experience. Had to pick up a gift for my wife. I was flying in from a different place, but everything was coordinated and arranged before my arrival. Even the personalisation I requested was completed in impeccable time. A special thank you to Areeba and Anwesha for the exceptional hospitality and prompt response and service.
Will definitely visit again.

I am absolutely appalled by the treatment I received at the Gucci store today. What should have been a simple shopping experience turned into a nightmare filled with blatant racism and disrespect. We were waiting outside the store, and when the staff member near the door asked the sales associate if we could be let in, she literally made a face as if she was disgusted by the idea of assisting us. To make matters worse, as soon as a white woman approached, she was immediately allowed into the store, and two associates were sent to assist her.
Are you seriously telling me that Gucci a brand that prides itself on luxury and exclusivity is okay with this kind of behavior? To experience blatant racism from your own people, especially in a high-end store, is beyond shameful. The sheer hypocrisy and audacity of it all is appalling. How can a company like Gucci continue to operate with such clear favoritism and discrimination? No wonder your sales are down I wouldn't spend a dime in a store that allows this kind of behavior to happen.
This was more than just poor customer service it was a direct act of discrimination. I expect nothing less than an explanation and a formal apology, but frankly, I don't think I'll be stepping foot in a Gucci store again.

Went to the store, they asked me to wait unnecessarily. This kind of waiting was acceptable during covid, but it's really weird to wait outside the store when it's fairly empty. This system needs to be looked at again as your global sales are declining. Upsetting customers is not the was to go. Thanks.

We all know it's a great product but in Delhi it's backed by very poor customer service. Total dis regard for people's time and patience. One definitely expects a better shopping experience than this. Either they are short staffed or just don't care about the customers because of the saleability of the brand. However it's a matter of time before things start to go down south cause it doesn't matter how good the product is, if it's not not backed by too notch service, it is doomed to fail !

Have been visiting Dior Chicago 🇺🇸 and decided to shop at Dior Delhi 🇮🇳 to pick up a scarf. The experience was horrible. The point of sales associate is to make your experience easier and informative. The associate in Dior Delhi was as uninformed as it could. I asked her the composition of the scarf and she replied: can u read it on the tag on your own?!! I mean Why be there when u don't know anything?! She wasn't even willing to make a sale.
@dior hire better people who know what it means to be a sales associate.

Least bothered staff, they promise to deliver on time but delays later after the payment, not sure about their own policies and no work ethics. Very bad experience, spending 1.5lacs and not getting proper information. They show no interest in clients. Mr.Karan was assisting me he didn't pass correct information about the delivery, even after mentioning 1000times it's a gift to someone they sent a receipt along. Dude have some common sense, you sending bills in gifts??? Horrible Experience!!

🎯 3 Strategic Recommendations for Louis Vuitton

Everything in this audit - the engagement gap on Instagram, the stale YouTube content, the India paid media opportunity, the WhatsApp channel failing at the last mile - points to three specific things LV should do differently. Each recommendation has a clear action, the evidence behind it, the customer pain point it addresses, and how to measure whether it worked.

Recommendation 1 - Fix Instagram Engagement

What to do -

Louis Vuitton should stop treating Instagram like a broadcast channel and start using it like a conversation.

The customer pain point here is real: luxury consumers follow LV because they want to feel like they belong to something exclusive and meaningful, not because they want to be served another campaign film. Right now, LV posts 23 times a week but almost nobody responds. An engagement rate of 0.065% tells you people are scrolling past, not stopping. They're not feeling anything. And for a brand that charges ₹1.5 lakh for a bag, "not feeling anything" is a serious problem.

The fix isn't posting more. It's posting differently. A weekly behind-the-scenes Reel from the Asnières atelier, a Story poll asking followers which bag silhouette they'd choose, a post where a craftsperson explains one detail by hand - these create the feeling of being let inside, which is what luxury consumers actually want. They don't want to be marketed to. They want to feel like insiders. Gucci managed to build 50.6M followers with only 328 posts by making every post feel rare and worth stopping for. That's the gap LV needs to close.

Why -

When I compared LV's engagement rate (0.065%) to Gucci's (1.14%) and Dior's (0.49%), the gap was hard to ignore. LV posts the most content of all three brands but generates the least response per post. The audience isn't disengaged with luxury content - they're disengaged with content that doesn't give them anything to react to.

The proof that the appetite exists is on LV's own YouTube channel. The Asnières Atelier craftsmanship documentary has 13 million views. People genuinely want to go deeper with this brand. They want to understand why a bag takes 600 hours to make, who the person is who makes it, what details most people will never notice. That content exists but it's sitting on YouTube while Instagram gets another celebrity campaign post.

Gucci's top Instagram posts - Jannik Sinner at 44,600 likes, Emily Ratajkowski at 95,100 likes - both feel specific and personal, not generic. LV's Zendaya post did get 129,000 likes, but one celebrity outlier doesn't fix a systemic content problem.

Expected result -

Within 6 months, the engagement rate should move from 0.065% toward at least 0.3%. More importantly, the quality of comments should change - fewer emoji responses, more people tagging friends or asking questions. Saves per post is actually the number I'd watch most closely, because saves mean someone found the content valuable enough to return to. That's a much better signal than likes.

How to measure success -

Check Instagram Insights every month - engagement rate, saves per post, and reach. Look at the actual comments on the new Reel format vs the old campaign posts and notice whether people are writing more. After 3 months, compare the engagement rate on craftsperson content specifically against standard campaign content. That comparison will tell you whether the content shift is working or whether the problem is somewhere else entirely.

Recommendation 2 - Revive YouTube with a Savoir-Faire Documentary Series

What to do -

LV should build a proper documentary series on YouTube - not another 30-second campaign film, but a real long-form series where you follow specific artisans at the Asnières atelier by name, watch them construct a piece from raw material to finished product and understand why the craft takes as long as it does.

The customer pain point this solves is the justification gap. Someone spending ₹1.5 lakh or more on a bag is making an emotional decision but needs rational anchoring to feel at peace with it. They want to believe the price is earned. Right now, LV's YouTube gives them almost nothing recent to build that belief with. The last strong piece of craftsmanship content was years ago. That customer is left to either trust the name alone or look elsewhere for the story and increasingly, they're finding it with Dior instead.

The channel already has the foundation in the Savoir-Faire playlist. This isn't starting from scratch. It's investing properly in what already works.

Why -

Every one of LV's top YouTube videos is 7 to 8 years old. The Emma Stone fragrance film has 15 million views. The Asnières Atelier documentary has 13 million. But recent content barely registers in comparison - the audience hasn't disappeared, the content just stopped being worth their time.

Dior proved in 2022 that this audience is still very much there. Their holiday campaign video now has 69 million views, and the comments tell you everything: "I never comment on commercials but this is simply amazing." "This ad is so whimsical and otherworldly." "I actually went out of my way to search it up." These are people who were moved enough to leave the app, find the video, and come back to write something. That is exactly the emotional depth LV used to create and has stopped creating.

The Savoir-Faire playlist has only 7 videos and has clearly been deprioritised. That's the single biggest untapped content asset the brand has.

Expected result -

A well-made documentary series - 4 to 6 episodes, each 6 to 10 minutes, following a different craftsperson or product category should realistically reach 5 million views per episode within the first 3 months if the production quality matches their historical standard. Subscriber growth from the current 5.44M is a secondary win. The bigger prize is getting picked up by fashion and culture publications, which the Dior Holidays video proved is achievable when the content is genuinely good.

How to measure success -

Track views per episode and average view duration - I'd want to see at least 60 to 70% of viewers watching past the halfway point, which would confirm the content is holding attention rather than just getting clicks. Compare the comment section on the new series to the comment section on old videos like the Asnières Atelier documentary. If people are writing detailed comments about the craft, the series is working. If they're just tagging friends, it's still good - but the brand storytelling goal isn't quite landing yet.

Recommendation 3 - India-First Paid Creative + Last Mile Fix

What to do -

LV should build India-first paid social content - not repurposed global campaigns with different captions, but creative that is actually made for India: Indian talent, Indian settings, copy written for someone in Mumbai or Delhi, and tied to cultural moments that Indian luxury consumers actually care about - the festive season, cricket, Indian cinema.

The customer pain point this addresses goes deeper than visibility. It is rejection. India's affluent consumer is globally aware, culturally proud, and increasingly vocal about wanting to see themselves reflected in the brands they spend on. When every luxury ad they scroll past features European settings and Western faces, the implicit message is: this brand isn't for you, you're just allowed to buy it.

But the Google Maps reviews from the DLF Emporio store make the problem even more urgent. Multiple reviewers describe being made to feel unwelcome in the store - judged by their clothes before being allowed in, ignored despite spending ₹1.5 lakh, having their WhatsApp messages go unanswered for days. One reviewer with 74 likes wrote that the Paris store treats customers better and shared the photo to prove it. This is not just an in-store operations problem. It is a brand perception crisis in LV's most important emerging market. India-first marketing is the first step, but it must be paired with training the in-store team to deliver the same welcome that the marketing promises. The ad brings the customer to the door. The store has to open it properly.

What LV should do: Create one India-specific campaign tied to a cultural moment. Train the Delhi store team on the India-first service standards the brand's digital infrastructure already promises. Activate the WhatsApp channel properly - respond within 2 hours, as the website implies you will.

Why -

When I filtered the Meta Ads Library to India, LV had 32 active ads. Gucci had 10. Dior had zero. LV is already the only luxury brand with any meaningful India paid media presence, but every single one of those 32 ads is a global campaign asset with no India-specific creative.

Meanwhile, LV has quietly built the strongest India digital infrastructure of any luxury brand: a dedicated India website at in.louisvuitton.com, INR pricing, a WhatsApp purchase button, and an India toll-free number. SimilarWeb shows LV already converts social traffic into website visits better than both Gucci and Dior - 3.725 million social visits versus Gucci's 739,000. The conversion engine is working. But it's being fed content that wasn't made for this audience and then failing at the last mile.

The Google Maps review data is the strongest evidence. LV's Delhi store has 831 reviews and a 4.2 rating - which sounds fine until you read the reviews themselves. The most-liked negative review has 74 likes from a customer who drove to the Paris store to prove a point. Multiple reviewers describe the WhatsApp channel - LV's single most India-specific tool, as unanswered. One customer confirmed a product was available via WhatsApp, drove 20km to the store, and was told it didn't exist. That is not a small service failure. That is the brand promise breaking in real time.

Compared to competitors: Gucci's Delhi store has a racism allegation as its highest-engagement review. Dior's store is blocking customers at the door based on appearance. All three brands are making the same mistake - building global prestige but delivering a Delhi experience that feels like the India market is an afterthought. LV has the biggest opportunity to be different here because it has already invested in the infrastructure. It just hasn't followed through on the promise.

Expected result -

One India-specific campaign - ideally tied to a cultural moment like a major cricket series, a Bollywood collaboration, or the festive season could establish LV as the luxury brand that actually sees India rather than just sells there. Reach of 5 million+ Indian luxury consumers on Meta in the first campaign is realistic given LV's existing infrastructure.

More importantly, fixing the WhatsApp response rate would immediately improve the conversion that the infrastructure is already almost achieving. The customer is at the door. They've confirmed availability on WhatsApp. They're ready to buy. If that channel works the way it should, the conversion numbers move without any additional marketing spend.

How to measure success -

Watch four numbers month by month: India ad reach on Meta, WhatsApp purchase button clicks from the India website, India traffic share on SimilarWeb, and Google Maps rating for the Delhi store.

If ad reach is high but WhatsApp clicks are flat, the creative is getting attention but not triggering intent - either the product mix or the call to action needs adjustment.

If the Google Maps rating improves from 4.2 toward 4.5 within 6 months, the service changes are working. That number is publicly visible to every potential customer who looks up the store before visiting. It is as important as any paid media metric.

💡 The One Line That Summarises This Entire Audit

> ➡️ Three luxury brands. One audit. Louis Vuitton leads India infrastructure, Gucci leads engagement, Dior leads emotion. LV has built the strongest digital foundation in the world's fastest-growing luxury market, but has yet to build the India-first creative strategy to match it, and is losing customers at the last mile because of it. That gap is the opportunity.
